

AUTHORS

Giorgi Gotua is a researcher at the Center for Studies of Social Practices (CSSP) in Tbilisi, Georgia. He is also a visiting researcher at Ilia State University, where he teaches courses on social research methods and the sociology of development. He has a bachelor's degree in political science and a master's degree in development studies. As an applied researcher, Gotua has been involved in several projects on civil society and development/democracy aid in Georgia. He has also done academic research on local power networks in regional Georgia. Gotua's work experience is mostly related to qualitative research; more recently, he has developed an interest in constructivist research.

Alexandra Kolesnik received her PhD (candidate of sciences) in history from Ural Federal University in Yekaterinburg in 2017. She is currently a senior research fellow at the Poletayev Institute for Theoretical and Historical Studies in the Humanities and lecturer at the School of History, National Research University–Higher School of Economics (Moscow). She teaches the history of popular culture. Her current research involves contemporary popular music studies (particularly Russian music geography and Russian heavy metal communities).

Nino Rcheulishvili is a PhD student at Ilia State University in Tbilisi, Georgia. Her research interests lie in the sociology of consumption and ethics, with a particular focus on food. In her doctoral project she is exploring hegemonic narratives in emerging food movements in Georgia. Since 2007 Rcheulishvili has been part of several research projects. She has an upcoming article about media representation of vegetarianism and fasting in Georgia in the journal Identity Studies in the Caucasus and the Black Sea Region. Her article about women's narratives of cooking in dual-earner families appeared in a 2016 publication from the Heinrich Böll Foundation, South Caucasus. Currently, Rcheulishvili teaches sociology and research methods at her home university.

Aleksandr Shirokov is a PhD student in the School of Communication and Information at Rutgers University (USA). His main research interests are ethnomethodology and conversation analysis, as well as science and technology studies. Currently he is involved in a project dedicated to the study of the communicative contours of medicine, and within it analyzes audio and video recordings of doctor-patient interactions. He is a (co)author of articles on ethnomethodology and science and technology studies published in the Russian-language journals Russian Sociological Review and Siberian Historical Research in 2017–2019.

Olena Strelnyk has a doctor of sciences degree in sociology. She is currently a scientific advisor at the Bureau of Gender Strategy and Budgeting, a nonprofit organization in Poltava (Ukraine), and teaches gender studies in the Department of Sociology at the Taras Shevchenko National University of Kyiv (Ukraine). Her most recent research focuses on mothering and the analysis of conservative and “antigender” initiatives in Ukraine. She is the author of the book Childcare as Work: A Sociological Perspective on Mothering (in Ukrainian; Krytyka, 2017), as well as of a number of academic, journalistic, and popular science articles on the topics of family, motherhood, and gender inequality in Ukraine.

Olga Vendina received a PhD (candidate of sciences) in social geography from the Institute of Geography of the Russian Academy of Science (Moscow) in 1992. She is currently a leading research fellow at the Center for Geopolitical Studies at IGRAS. Her academic interests include urban studies, migration problems, and the border studies. Current research examines interethnic relationships in metropolitan areas, primarily in Moscow, and explores post-Soviet evolution of the core geopolitical categories of conceptualizing Russia (empire and/or nation) through quantitative methods of semantic analysis. Vendina is the author of numerous articles, as well as several books and collective monographs. Among her recent publications (in Russian) are chapters in The Russian Borderland: Challenges of Neighborhood (IP Matushkina I. I., 2018) and Multiethnic City: The Problems and Prospects for the Cultural Diversity Management in the Metropolitan Areas (Sektor, 2018), coauthored with Emil Pain.

Oksana Zaporozhets received her PhD (candidate of sciences) in social sciences from Ural State University in Yekaterinburg in 1999. She is currently a leading research fellow at the Poletayev Institute for Theoretical and Historical Studies in the Humanities and associate professor in Sociology Department, National Research University–Higher School of Economics (Moscow). Her current research projects are in the field of urban studies and focus on public spaces, graffiti and street art as a means of urban communication, and new residential districts.